Principal Researcher: Rick Audas is an Assistant Professor in the Faculty of Administration at UNB. He believes that academic achievement is a critical factor in long term economic renewal for Atlantic Canada and views increasing accountability in education is one way in which this can be improved. Co-author: Charles Cirtwill is Director of Operations at AIMS and head of the Institute's Education and School Reform Project.

Data challenges and changes in the school system resulted in the exclusion of some schools from this analysis and the inclusion of older schools that have now been closed or renamed. For New Brunswick, the following schools are not included: New Brunswick Learning Centres, Private Schools and Bernice McNaughton High School.

A NOTE ON PEI – Unfortunately, there is no program of provincial student assessment in PEI, which makes comparisons across schools difficult. A request for summary data on enrolment in college preparatory courses and other possible indicators of performance received no response from the Department of Education.

Using national and international testing data we can report that PEI, like the other three Atlantic provinces, consistently falls below the national average. Specifically, PEI ranked 8th on reading and mathematics and 9th in science (out of ten provinces) on the most recent Program of International Student Assessment. This poor performance is replicated in the International Adult Literacy Survey results which suggest that quantitative and literacy skill levels of Islanders are quite low in comparison to the rest of the country.
