

Acknowledgements

Many people made valuable contributions to this research. I wish to thank my principal readers, Jim Feehan, Economics Professor at Memorial University of Newfoundland and member of the AIMS Research Board of Advisors, and Robert Lawson, Economics Professor at Shawnee State University, and one of the principal authors of the Economic Freedom Index, a work sponsored by research institutes in 10 nations and Hong Kong. Other members of AIMS' Research Board also helped me with important comments, including: Colin Dodds, Vice-President, Academic and Research, Saint Mary's University; Doug May, Memorial University Economics Professor; James McNiven, Dalhousie University Public Administration Professor and former Nova Scotia Deputy Minister of Development; and Edwin G. West, Professor Emeritus, Carleton University.

As well, AIMS President, Brian Lee Crowley, made important and insightful comments. I also wish to thank him for his great patience in the preparation of this research. The research started as a straightforward competitiveness study, but I became dissatisfied with the insights such an approach produced. Instead, I began to look at the relationship between regional subsidies and regional competitiveness. What I found in the data was not what I expected, and I spent months working through it, all the time with Brian's support and help. My focus had been on micro-economic mechanisms, and this produced some interesting material, but the key insight came when Ralph Winter, retired Acadia University professor, sent me an unpublished paper of his and suggested I look at the problem from a work/leisure and trade perspective. I soon realized that a number of predictions fell out of this approach, and found them verified in the data.

Those named above have not simply immeasurably improved this research, they have also greatly expanded and added to its content, limiting any credit the author can take. Of course, I remain responsible for any remaining errors.

Finally, let me thank John Robson for his valuable assistance in drafting the press release and executive summary; Leah White, who provided early research assistance; Derick Honig for his usual excellence in the design and production of this book and the cover design; Paula Adamski for her thorough proof of the book; Shelly Hayden for preparing the graphs; and Edgar Beals for the cover illustration. - FJM
